

MGR

Wednesday, November 21, 2007

The Honorable Curtis Gomez, District Judge
USVI District Court
Number 8 Norre Gade
St. Thomas, USVI 00802

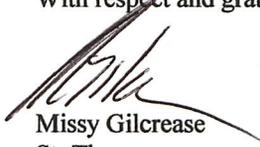

Dear Judge Gomez:

My daughter, Savannah Kerr, attends Montessori Upper School and was privileged to attend the 'federal gun trial' staged in your court week before last.

I'm writing to thank you and our personal friend Bob Roberg, along with all the other court employees in attendance, for the dramatic performance and the impression it made. For quite some time, Savannah has had a deep interest in our legal system and prosecution. I don't think I've ever seen her quite as excited and impressed over anything as she was over her 'day in court'. The message of persevering in education to pursue legal careers and making kids aware of the ongoing challenges that face our court personnel were priceless.

It is so gratifying to know that you and your court care enough to include our youth in the constitutional process. How else will they ever come to appreciate the contribution and sacrifices made every day to preserve human rights and dignity?

With respect and gratitude,

Missy Gilcrease
St. Thomas

cc: Robert Roberg

Teens get close-up look at courts during mock trial

By JOSEPH TSIDULKO
Daily News Staff

ST. THOMAS — Nearly 100 high school students got the chance to witness a dramatic federal gun trial on Thursday, then talk to the people who made it possible.

The Charlotte Amalie, Kean and Montessori high school students participated in Kids and the Court, an educational program started three years ago by District Judge Curtis Gomez that shows students the career opportunities available to them in the justice system.

For the students' benefit, Gomez employed a little deception.

After gathering in the federal courtroom, the judge told the teenagers he thought it would be instructive for them to see a small trial that was on the morning's calendar. The judge did not reveal that the trial was staged.

For most of the students, the trial peaked when the unruly defendant — a fisherman charged with offering a coworker money to stash an assault rifle — shoved aside his attorney and charged the witness stand.

Many gasped when the fisherman, played by Deputy U.S. Marshal Bob Roberg, was tackled and handcuffed by two of his fellow marshals. Deputy Marshal David Drake simulated using a stun gun to subdue the defendant, letting the students hear its electricity crackle.

The mock trial was a first for the program.

The guilty verdict, and a subsequent 10-year prison sentence and $100,000 fine, became a topic of controversy among the teens, who voiced their disappointment after Gomez revealed the trial had been staged for their benefit.

In a show of hands, the vast majority of students disagreed with the conviction.

Denique Jacobs, a Kean 12th grader, said the fisherman got what he deserved. Prosecuting criminals was the career that was most appealing, she said.

But her friend, 11th grader J'Nelle Blake, said she would rather be on the other side of the aisle.

In true defense attorney fashion, Blake said evidence presented at the trial was mostly irrelevant, and the fisherman should have been allowed to go free.

"Everybody deserves a second chance," J'Nelle said. Montessori student Nathaniel Fuller was less certain.

"It seemed like he was guilty," the ninth grader said. All agreed they enjoyed the stuntwork of the U.S. marshals.

The students then heard from the court's employees: the judge, prosecutors and defense attorneys, a tech support administrator, a court reporter and federal marshals.

Daily News Photo by NICK SCHNEEMAN

During a mock trial event Thursday, U.S. marshals David Drake, left, and Paul Nielsen pretend to subdue Bob Roberg, who acted as an agitated defendant.

Court reporter Chandra Kean demonstrated the complicated functions of a stenography machine. She told the group that when she was a student at Kean, she attended a similar presentation that inspired her career choice.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Everard Potter, who prosecuted the fisherman, told the students that when he was a Kean student he was not sure he could become a lawyer. He got poor SAT scores, and teachers advised him to go into the military instead of to college.

But Potter persevered with his education. "In life, you have to find things that motivate you," he said.

Assistant Federal Public Defender Jesse Gessin, who wrote the trial's script, told the students that he frequently is asked how he can defend people he knows might be guilty.

Gessin said defense attorneys fight for their clients' constitutional rights by requiring prosecutors to meet their burden of proof. He also said defense lawyers willfully limit their knowledge of the crime.

It was hard to top the marshals, who had tools at their disposal certain to awe teenagers.

Deputy Marshal Paul Nielsen walked into court decked out in full tactical gear. The marshals showed the students an assault rifle, a shotgun, a retractable baton, pepper spray and a shield.

Gomez hopes to conduct similar sessions once a month and has sent letters to all the territory's high school principal's inviting them to the court.